

Chief Elmer Gates

Fox Dog #2

If there were a medal given in each division for "the most valuable man" Chief Elmer Gates of Santa Ana, Calif., would doubtless be the Fire Division's honored man. As second in command his responsibilities in directing fire security in Los Angeles Harbor have been enormous. Yet Specialist Gates has always handled his duties with encouraging easiness and fine determination. His men have found him to be one of those rare human beings who can get the best from his personnel without demanding it.

Fox Dog #3

If there is anyone who has been completely conscientious about his duties in this war that man is certainly Chief Specialist Miles Brown. Member of Long Beach fire department before he enlisted, Chief Brown probably understands better than any person in the Fire Division the problems of fire security in this area. For good reason Fire Division men have nick-named him the "Worry Wart." Firefighter Brown seldom puts his problems down. It is said in the stations that if Miles Brown ever relaxed on the job the whole division would fall apart. It probably would.
