

An electronic sensor which is used to record changes of salinity, temperature and depth as it is lowered through the water. The data is collected automatically on chart paper.

Nansen bottles were used to collect water samples at various depths. The bottles also had reversing thermometers to record the water temperature at the depth collected.