

Along the coast, life is abundant. There are several varieties of birds, including the first citizen of Antarctica—the penguin. There are also many types of whales, seals, fishes, and a variety of moss and microscopic organisms.

Ice and the abundance of potential protein sources in Antarctic waters could someday be an answer to dwindling sources of food and fresh water for the increasing world population.